How a Telegram Saved a Train Full

ern Express Company and owned by the Eastern railroad. The night train from Bangor last Wednesday night contained this car, and in it, just before the train reached Portsmouth, were the conductor, messenger, and baggage-master. Suddenly one of the gentlemen felt a jolt, as if the car was dropping from under him, and sprang to his feet and caught hold of something tirm in the hope to save himself in the expected crash. The conductor, seeing the movement, seized the bell-rope, but, as he felt nothing strange, did not ring, and the train passed on to Portsmouth. No examination was made here, as was formerly the universal custom, and the train proceeded to-ward Boston. It had hardly left the depôt before the night-watchman found on the give them a start. track between the rails a lateral car-spring, and thinking it could come from no other place but from under this train, he hurried to the telegraph office and sent a dispatch to Greenland, the nearest station, five miles away, to stop the train and examine it to see if a spring had been lost. The green falling of this spring upon the track which caused the jar already spoken of, and which awakened the gentleman from his doze beyond Portsmouth. If it had fallen upon the rail a wreck would have been inevitable. Had the car lurched badiy upon the bridge at Kutery the signal-tower there would have been struck and disaster would have resulted. Had the spring dropped elsewhere than within the range of the watchman's vision the train would have sped on until it had reached some curve at speed, when the cars would probably have been torn from the road-bed into ruis. It is very strange that capitalists seeking profitable investment for their money do not employ a part of it in forming jointstock farming companies. It is well-known that farming cannot now profitably be carried on without capital and machinery; but with these, farming is one of the most reasonably sure of all occupations, and is the most beneficent in its effects upon society. Farming companies could purchase land in large bodies, procure the best labor-saving machinery and implements, and bire labor to any extent desired. Such companies would at once form small communities with their laborers, and thus obviate one of the great objections that city laborers have to going to the country-namely : its loneliness. The American is a gregarious being. Our school system and our universal system of organized labor form the habit of working in company, and it is painful for him to perform solitary labor. If a company should near the centre of it cottages for fifty families, these families could have all the advantages of town life in the way of schools, amusements, and cooperation. Such companies would need to hire for superintendent a practical farmer, who should be paid a percentage on the profits of the farm. The laborers might be hired either at so much wages, or they also might participate in the profits. Doubtless it would be as easy to arrange these details as in case of all other at North Beverly was one used by the East- joint-stock companies engaged in productive industry.

Some of the advantages in joint-stock farming companies would be that large capital could be used without any one man jeopardizing more capital than he could afford to lose. Laborers could be obtained without difficulty. The surplus population of cities would thus be drained off. Laborers and capitalists would both be benefited, and consequently the country at large. They would create a demand for educated farmers for superintendents, and stimulate the acquisition of scientific methods in farming. The laborers would be taught farming under practical guidance, and thus be prepared to strike out for themselves when they have saved enough money to

That the cultivation of the soil in this way can be made immensely profitable may be inferred from the pecuniary success of many communities. The Oneida community has only a little over 700 acres of land, yet its clear income last year is reported to good opinions of all. have been $76,000. They have vineyards, fruit- and vegetable-gardens, great canning establishments, orchards, and are rich with soil. There is no reason why the same sucpanies suitably managed. City merchants could thus have their interests in the farming communities, and could draw their dividends from their stock in such enterprises and assist in developing the agricultural wealth of the country while remaining at work themselves in their counting-houses .-St. Louis Globe.

pic Club, appears destined to reopen the discussion concerning the effects of muscular training upon vitality. In order to it is necessary to state the case correctly in the beginning. The facts are briefly these : Several years ago Mr. Bennett found himself affected by symptoms of pulmonary disease. At that time he had never practiced gymnastics, and was slender and weakly. Acting upon the advice of friends he joined veloped great muscular power. He became eventually a remarkable athlete and active gymnast. His strength was so great that he could put up a 250-pound dumbell with one hand, and 150 with the other. He was an expert boxer and a daring acrobat. On gymnast, and a well-known compositor, was performing what is called the Niagara leap, and fell from the trapeze some twentyfive or thirty feet above the stage. Bennett was standing directly underneath, and as the falling man approached he clasped him in his arms, and by the exertion of his great strength saved his life though the snock strained him severely. When Mace, the the gloves with him, and the champion was neer, and a part of the way beside the engllinquished gymnastics five or six years ago.
